

What is SCA?

Sudden Cardiac Arrest (SCA)

claims nearly 350,000 lives each year. Unlike a heart attack, during sudden cardiac arrest, heart function stops abruptly and without warning due to a disruption of the heart's electrical system. When this happens the heart is no longer able to pump blood to the brain and throughout the body, and the result is death for 95% of the victims.

SCA is the leading cause of death in student athletes. Every year 10,000 young people die from SCA.¹ Many appear healthy and have no known family history of heart-related illness. Even though medical tests can detect the presence of heart concerns, most standard sports physicals do not include testing. Additionally, insurance companies generally do not cover their costs without the presence of symptoms or a family history of heart problems.

Typically, SCA symptoms are silent until it is too late. As a result, screening is critical to prevention. An echocardiogram can detect the potential for SCA with 99% accuracy and many of the problems detected can be treated or corrected. For this reason it is essential that screening be done at an early age.²
